Mission Briefing: Mission 2 – Dark Cave

Veins of Shadow: The Ontranis Descent

During the plunder of Okamec's poisoned skies, warbands uncovered a derelict comms station still clinging to power amid the fungal ruins. From its fractured arrays came a broken transmission — a psychic signature and coordinates pointing to a Voidcrown shard buried deep beneath the frozen crust of Ontranis.

The outer world offered no easy prize. Once a dutiful mining colony under the Frog-Mages' Truth, Ontranis now lies scarred by rebellion and the growing psychic storms. The shard's call drew the hunters underground into vast, lightless cave networks. A fragment of the ancient crown, if united with its lost siblings, could crown the Voidsun itself and let its bearer bend the raging psychic tempests to their will. Some descend chasing that terrible power. Others seek shelter from the lethal cold above or simply move to deny the prize to their rivals. All will learn that the dark holds its own hungers.

The caves are treacherous ground. Low ceilings choke the skies, forcing even the swiftest to tread like mortals. Without warning the rock betrays, sinkholes yawning wide to swallow units whole and spit them out elsewhere in the labyrinth. Jagged stalactites loom overhead, ready to be shattered into killing rain. And the shadows themselves hunger, striking hardest at those who linger near the edges or reveal their positions with flickering lights.

Warbands must seize and hold scattered objectives in this black maze while balancing the double-edged gift of illumination. Light reveals the foe but paints clear targets; killing the lamps invites the dark to feed. The fight will not end with a clean exfil. It will grind on until one side dominates the depths or the caves themselves grow weary of the intruders.

The Voidsun stirs above the ice. Descend. Claim the shard. Pray the shadows do not claim you first.

The abyss is watching.