Resonance Cascade: The Dig on Xolkan

The crystal found in the caves of Ontranis did not remain silent after it was claimed. Contact with a living mind, and the moment it was carried off-world, sent a psychic shock through the remaining shards. Across the Loppian System the cascade answered. Every sensor, every scavenged detector, every fractured psy-array lit with the same screaming signature. At the same time the Voidsun itself began to stir. The second Voidcrown fragment had revealed itself — buried deep in the wreckage fields of Xolkan.

Once the culmination of the Frog-Mages' psychic ambitions, the Voidsun lies at the heart of the system: a second sun of pure psychic fire, born when the ancient storms were forced into a single raging heart. The three crystals are the keys that once channelled its power. Since the first shard left Ontranis the black sun has grown restless. Storms have thickened across the outer worlds. Reality frays a little further each day. The pressure is no longer subtle, and every warband with eyes to see can feel the change.

Xolkan was never a gentle world. Long ago it served as a mining colony under the Frog-Mages' Truth, its surface scarred by open pits and half-buried machinery. Now the outer world is a graveyard of shattered hulls, collapsed temples, and abandoned dig sites. The cascade has drawn every ambitious warband to the same coordinates, where the second crystal lies buried beneath layers of wreckage and frozen earth. Some come seeking the power the shards promise. Others come only to deny that power to their rivals. All of them must dig.

The dig site itself is treacherous ground. Broken decks and ancient stone form a maze of unstable trenches, collapsing platforms, and half-excavated chambers. The psychic cascade rattles the air. Heavy machinery lies half-buried in the ice, its silence broken only by the occasional groan of shifting wreckage. The longer the battle rages, the more the ground seems to settle and shift as if the world itself is listening to the resonance.

Warbands must push into the heart of the excavation, seize the key sites that mark the crystal's resting place, and hold them long enough to extract the prize. There will be no clean extraction. Only the force that dominates the dig and still has strength left to carry the shard away will leave Xolkan richer than they arrived.

The Voidsun is stirring. The storms are already howling.
